

Method for initiating the crystallization of a supercooled aqueous hydrate solution involves applying an electric field between electrodes. Wherein one electrode is immersed in the solution, the other is placed in a gaseous environment above its surface without contact with the liquid, and high-voltage pulses are applied to the electrodes, sufficient to generate a surface spark discharge between the electrode above the surface and the surface of the solution.