

Method for rapidly heating the coolant in a vehicle diesel engine involves installing a liquid heat exchanger on the brake caliper assembly in the area where it heats up due to the braking process. The heat exchanger is connected to the engine cooling system with hoses filled with coolant, and its circulation using the engine cooling system pump is provided. The coolant is heated simultaneously with the heat generated during engine operation and the heat produced when the vehicle brakes.