

Wave-induced electric power generator consists of a coil with windings and a core containing a permanent magnet, which is located inside the coil and capable of reciprocating motion relative to the windings. A pendulum lever with a return spring is used to move the core, allowing the lever to rotate around a horizontal axis.