

Method for sampling coal to effectively determine the germanium content involves taking channel samples of coal. In the mining working within the coal seam, notional strata 0.2 m thick are identified in the roof and floor, from which channel samples are collected perpendicular to the thickness of the coal seam for subsequent determination of germanium concentrations and quantitative assessment of its distribution.