

Method of direct iron reduction that utilizes a system containing a blast furnace for the direct reduction of iron oxides to metallic iron. The reduction process uses a reducing gas produced within the system, from which the waste gas is removed after reduction. The reducing gas is produced by coal gasification. The unreacted waste gas is used to generate electricity. This electricity is used to electrolyze water. The resulting hydrogen is added to the reducing gas.