

Thermoelectric method for locating leaks in underground utility networks involves scanning soil surface in areas where leaks are expected and visualizing and comparing changes in its thermal state relative to adjacent surface areas, wherein the leak location is determined by directly converting specific heat flux on ground surface into electrical signal using thermoelectric module based on the Seebeck effect; this signal is then recorded and compared with similar signals from adjacent areas of ground surface.